Fake news and fact checking

Last Revised – 16. Jan. 2019

What is fake news?
Fake news is defined as news stories that are false. The story is fabricated and there are no verifiable facts, sources or quotes. Fake news can be propaganda that is intentionally designed to mislead the reader or may be designed as "clickbait" written for economic incentives. Think about advertisements, or writers that profit on the number of people who click on their story.

The dangers of fake news
Just how harmful are fake news? A little bit of fake news is nothing new, right? Wrong. There is a dangerous new trend: "deep fake" technology. With deep fake technology, it's possible to create audio and video of real people saying and doing things they never said or did. Deep fakes are more realistic and resistant to detection.

1. Fake statements can influence business
Falsely created videos can show events that have never happened. They can show people saying things which they never said. Fake statements by CEOs (bosses of companies) or banking officials could have a big effect on the financial markets. They can ruin these people's reputation or the reputation of their business and people can start buying from other companies instead.

2. Fake news can influence politics
A fake article such as "BREAKING: Pope Francis Backed Trump..." (back support) can leave a huge impact on politics and elections. Pope Francis is one of the biggest influencers when it comes to the Catholic Church. So, if he backs a certain politician, some people will perhaps also back that politician because they think the Pope did that.

3. Fake multimedia can ruin personal lives
Photoshopped images of two people meeting, intimate scenes, and much more will ruin a person's personal life. People usually start judging without checking the facts or the source.

4. Fake news can create confusion
When you find different information on one topic, it's difficult to know which source is correct.

5. Fake news can cause crime
Some readers who believe a fake article or fake post will potentially harm others for revenge. Then, things can go out of hand and can get really dangerous.

How to spot fake news - 10 Fact checking tips for students
This checklist will help you to see if your source is trustworthy or if it might be fake news.

4 Video formats

1. TV show
In this format people with different roles are filmed, sometimes in front of a green screen. It is possible to do this for example like a talk show or like an interview.

2. V-log (TikTok/YouTube-style)
In this format there are 1-2 speakers who talk about a topic. It can be shorts or the speakers can also walk around, dance, sing, rap...

3. Explainity
In this format an app is used with illustrations to talk about a topic. If you type into the app what you want to say, the app will give you some illustrations. The app can also read out loud your text.

4. Stopmotion
In this format objects are used to tell a story or to talk about a topic. Often Playmobil figures are used or plastiline (as modelling material) or papers. But also, for food videos this format is often chosen.

Media consumption

On the following three pages you will see news reports from the last few years.

Evaluate the credibility of each one spontaneously and give brief reasons for your decision.

News reports from the last few years are shown, including a report about a cow and a report about a car accident.
